Retirement Home Belleville - Residents of retirement housing complexes are, for the most part, able to take care of themselves. In some cases retirement communities would allow home care companies into the community to help several residents with minor care needs that they may have. The definition of a retirement community is not straightforward, but the majority of communities share certain characteristics. Such characteristics consist of features like age restriction, individuals must be fully or partially retired, and the community should include common services and amenities.

Because there are various types of retirement communities, it can be rather confusing to do some research regarding them. Some of the types of communities are congregate housing, independent living communities, subsidized housing, continuing care communities, lifestyle or leisure oriented communities and recreational vehicles or mobile homes. Continuing care communities provide care as the requirements of the individual change throughout life. Subsidized housing is usually provided to seniors with low income. Congregate housing is an arrangement where a minimum of one meal a day is shared with other residents. Independent living communities usually provide little or no personal care services. Mobile homes, recreational vehicles, and leisure oriented communities are usually targeted towards seniors who are more active.

A senior cohousing is another style of retirement community which is unique. This particular kind of arrangement originated within Europe and evolved around the idea of intergenerational housing, that has been utilized by many cultures for a lot of years. It usually includes units that are individually owned surrounded by a common house or common area. Several communities can comprise living quarters for home health care aids, whose assistance can be shared among residents. Cohousing residents socialize regularly and support and encourage each other. Communities are designed to make access and activity simple for all levels of physical ability.

Residents in a cohousing community share ownership and management of how the community is planned and operated on a daily basis. Normally, the age requirement to be classified as senior housing is that at least three-quarters of the residents should be older than 55 years. Other required characteristics of a cohousing community are that there are shared facilities, the residents manage the community, the residents contribute to the design of the community, there is not a shared community economy, all members share equally in the decision making process and the community is designed to encourage a sense of community.

With the numerous and varied types of retirement communities available, people should be able to find a community that suits their needs and preferences as well as their financial abilities.
