Retirement Residences Belleville - Entering into a new phase of life, especially one which involves such drastic changes as in moving into an assisted care facility, can be very stressful. A lot of what one's lifestyle will look like in the future is unknown and can cause high levels of resistance and fear about moving into an assisted living condition out of one's house.

To ensure that the facility is appropriate and that the present requirements of an individual could be met, prospective residents must be assessed before they can move into an assisted living facility. Fees for assisted living are often determined by a base rate in addition to fees for services needed. Sometimes there is a fee per service, which is simply added to the monthly bill of the resident. Other times there may be a flat rate per month based on the level of assistance that was determined during the first assessment. Assistance services usually consist of things like for instance help with grooming, toileting or bathing, getting dressed, management of the person's medications and assistance with transfers.

When looking for a suitable facility, make sure to schedule for a short term stay before committing. This is the only way to get an idea of what life will be like within the community or facility. It isn't possible to experience all aspects of the community from a short term stay, but it is the best way to get a general sense of the surroundings and whether or not the facility will remain on the list of candidates.

Assisted living facilities offer a wide range of services and amenities, so it is always a great idea to research each and every facility to see if what they provide fits with the desires and needs of the person. In addition, the needed level of assistance at every stage of life might change, so searching for a facility that could adapt to potentially changing needs is ideal. Although not as common, there are existing facilities which provide assisted living as well as nursing care. These are generally called continuing care facilities and they are a good option for those who would not like to move into entirely different facilities every time their level of need increases.

Assisted living facilities vary significantly in the number of residents, kind of housing, services, and amenities which they offer. Residents could reside in apartments that can be studios, one bedroom, or two bedroom units or they may reside in separate homes. Within assisted living facilities residents can enter and leave the facility whenever they want. Although some units may have small kitchenettes for preparing simple meals and snacks, meals are normally served in shared dining halls and residents normally have a choice of meals from a menu. Assisted living facilities have other common places like for instance pools, libraries, fitness centres, activity rooms, and even hair salons. Having numerous common places encourages residents to be more social with each other. Guests are allowed and are normally required to simply sign in at the front desk. Outside of normal business hours doors might be locked, so visitors might need to be let in by security.
